To Whom It May Concern,

For the past year, Christopher Winn has worked for me as a literary editor and agent, helping me market my writings. As a consequence we have contracts for two poetry collections, in book form, as well as several publications in individual magazines. Besides the actual work he has done, his advice and good judgement has been invaluable.

When we had meetings scheduled, he was always on time, and the few times he couldn't be, he would call to let me know he would be a few minutes late. This may seem like a trivial matter, but, in my experience, conscientiousness cannot always be assumed, and, to me, it indicates not only good character in a person, but common decency and courtesy. Being on time is a form of honoring a contract and keeping one's word, qualities which any employer cherishes.

Not only, therefore, does Mr. Winn have personal characteristics, which are of the highest order, but his work ethic is more than impeccable. He consistently, and with good cheer, does more than is actually required of him.

When he told me that he was exploring new possibilities, he gave me six week's notice, another indication of his good character and basic courtesy. He said, "I will help my successor get oriented." My reply was, "Christopher, there is no successor to you, only a replacement."

Because of his intelligence, initiative, and personal qualities, any employer would be fortunate to have his services.

Sincerely,

Peter Hoheisel
